Influenced by the humanitarian ideals of the French Revolution and by his elevated concept of love, for his first and only opera Beethoven chose the story of the French drama Léonore ou l'amour conjugal (Leonor or marital love) by Jean-Nicolas Bouilly, for which Pierre Gaveaux wrote a musical score in 1789, followed by

Ferdinando Paër in 1804, amongst others. Bouilly's music was a pièce à sauvetage, or "rescue piece", a very popular genre at a time when heroes representing the forces of good, justice and reason would triumph when in a situation of great danger and following a series of ups and downs. Written during the composer's romantic period, Fidelio incorporates important stylistic novelties, such as the relevance of the chorus and of soloists in respect to the orchestration, to achieve greater dramatic force. In this opera, which according to Beethoven was "the child that has cost me the greatest pain, and the greatest sorrows; but also the one most loved", the composer unfolds his ethical vision, his belief in the values of justice and reason, as well as his message of hope and universal fraternity.

Nearly a decade after its original premiere, two failed versions, multiple revisions, work to shorten the original and four different overtures, Fidelio was premiered with great success in 1814, and is the form in which this opera is usually performed at present.
