“Somewhere in the Andalusian steppe a mature couple of childless landowners are celebrating their anniversary. They reach the music room of the country estate where they live, and have drunk enough so as to not handle their emotions with skill. From the exterior they hear the insistent rumour of a pasodoble that perhaps comes from the settlement adjacent to the property, where the inhabitants seem to be celebrating an open air dance in honour of their masters. Excited by the alcohol, little by little the owners open the valve of their shared memories, and a torrent of lament, reproach and resentment pours, filling the room with an incontrollable stench. Accusations fly from Him to Her and vice-versa; there are murderous serpentines and saints hanging from the neck; there are rapes, statutory rapes and gunshots in the back of the neck. THIS is what we want our Pasodoble to be”. Juan Carlos Sánchez
