musician, in contrast with his national contemporary colleagues considered the heirs of Mikhail Glinka's so-called Russian musical essentialism.

The confirmation that Tchaikovsky had started to work on what would be his Symphony No. 5, Op. 64 is found in a letter he wrote to his very wealthy friend and protector Nadezhda von Meck in the spring of 1888: "Do you know that I am trying to write a symphony? The beginning has been difficult, but now, however, it seems that inspiration has arrived, let's see!" The symphony was finished by the 26th of August that same year.
